90V of Summer

Purple Lamborghini Huracán Performante found in a ditch outside of London. Crushed time transforms heat into colour. 90 volts pushed across the hood of the car flattens light. Monochrome glints of sun coming through the trees with darkened shadows. Flash photos show plastic charred against metal, covered in dirt. It has a slim low profile that shifted on its horizontal axis looks like a wing of a recently welded plane. Soft almost reversible scars that mark points of assembly remind me that I could slice through the atoms in its metal, passing my hand through its healing wound. Plastic feels to separate from itself, glue melts under heat revealing moments of release like speed lengthening a hand out the window, glowing. Limbs appear and disappear from the bodies of the car. Mirror hits, small scratches. A malleability. Plastic. Pieced together it performs velocity even in stasis.
